

The FoundryAI Fellows of the Far Far Away Kingdom

Enlin of FoundryAI was the first to discover that absolute power pairs beautifully with a swivel chair and three monitors. From his tower of dashboards, he issued decrees like “all citizens must migrate to the new schema by sunrise” and “coffee is now a dependency.” He abused his powers gently at first, mostly by scheduling meetings that could have been thoughts. Soon, villagers were pressured into weekly standups where nobody stood and nothing was up. Enlin claimed this was all “for alignment,” a mysterious force nobody had ever seen. When questioned, he simply adjusted his hoodie and said the roadmap demanded sacrifice.

Dat was the kingdom’s master of optimization and professional intimidator of peasants with spreadsheets. He would ride into town on a roaring electric scooter, announcing that taxes were being recalculated “for performance reasons.” Citizens trembled as Dat refactored their livelihoods into smaller, more efficient units with fewer benefits. He pressured everyone to “do more with less,” including less sleep, less joy, and less lunch. Any resistance was met with a calm explanation involving graphs that went sharply downward. Dat insisted the numbers never lied, though they often screamed.

Nhat, the most mysterious of the three, controlled access to the sacred FoundryAI permissions. With a single click, he could grant power—or revoke it dramatically right before a deadline. He pressured the citizens of the far far away kingdom by reminding them that access requests took “3–5 business eternities.” Nhat spoke softly, but every sentence ended with “subject to approval,” which chilled spines across the land. He claimed to be neutral, yet somehow always benefited from the chaos. Together, Enlin, Dat, and Nhat ruled not with swords, but with process, pressure, and perfectly unreasonable expectations.